Prologue

This paper is a result of work done by over 1300 students from 11 countries, in partnership with The Centre for Global Education, Canadian Commission for UNESCO, TakingITGlobal, the Centre for Global Citizenship Education and Research, and the Global Centre for Pluralism. Students came together to collaborate, through the use of technology, in a Virtual Town Hall to discuss the youths’ vision for Global Citizenship Education. From every continent, the youth of the world exchanged ideas, debated alternatives, and ultimately created a document that represents their voice on the relationship education should have with global citizenship. The Virtual Town Hall was the culmination of months of online teamwork, 10,000 hours of student collaboration, over 500 hours of teacher facilitation, and the passion of these youth to engage in an international conversation and have their voices heard.

Paper Structure

The White Paper is structured around a seasonal song cycle. A song cycle consists of a set of solo pieces that are intended to be sung as a unit. The sections of each theme in this paper - summer, autumn, winter, and spring - reflect the ever changing but interconnected character of the natural world. Like the natural world, we want to be ever changing yet completely cohesive in the approach for global citizenship, as we aspire for our ideals (summer), work through our concerns (autumn) and questions (winter), to consider new ways of moving forward (spring).

Introduction

In this project, we united around a key idea from the Universal Declaration of Human Rights:

"Everyone is entitled to all the rights and freedoms set forth in this Declaration, without distinction of any kind, such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status. Furthermore, no distinction shall be made on the basis of the political, jurisdictional or international status of the country or territory to which a person belongs, whether it be independent, trust, non-self-governing or under any other limitation of sovereignty."

Article 2, Universal Declaration of Human Rights

A strong concern emerged that we live in the twenty first century, yet not everyone has access to the same basic rights. It is important for global citizens to ensure that everyone has this access. As long as substantial inequality persists, we cannot talk about progress in societies on a global level.

During the project, we recognized inequality as being caused by already existing gaps between people and nations. As youth from different countries and contexts, we worry about how an imperial instinct plays into this. The interdependence of economic systems and pre-established hierarchies make it harder for global relations to be equitable because nations often enter into agreements based on self interest. We recognize that the different positions from which people enter into these conversations about major global issues make it difficult for some people to be heard and be part of the change. As youth, we are one of those groups who feel they do not have the opportunity to have our say. It's most likely that people who have more opportunity have the voice and end up speaking for everyone.

Through our discussions, an important question kept coming up: is equality a goal that erases complexity? We wondered if focusing on equality can result in treating people the same instead of achieving fairness. Can this view of equality lead to simple ideas that don't really change or challenge inequalities? This question led us to begin to use the word equity as we recognized how we are each constructed by our histories and context. Equity is acknowledging different needs of people and communities in their contexts. Equity is about being in dialogue with all people and recognizing that many people are marginalised in a variety of ways.

The concept of equity and discussions of justice and fairness have been central to all aspects of this project. We all have different backgrounds, religions, cultures, languages, genders, and races, and many experience marginalisation which impacts us in different ways and prevents us from having what we perceive as a good life. This means that we are working with a huge variety of people who don’t always agree or relate to each other, which makes conversations complex.

As we came together around the idea of global citizenship, we saw that it related to all of these issues. In this paper, we will use and understand the term global citizenship in a dynamic way. It can and must be questioned through different lenses. We need to be constantly examining who is and is not assumed to be a global citizen. In this project we recognize that having the space to consider and analyze global citizenship is itself a privilege many people don’t have, and we want to always keep that in mind.

Global citizenship will not be defined by one set of actions – it is an ongoing conversation about multiple ways to enable equity around the world. Because of different positions in societies, people will experience global citizenship differently and will have different sets of responsibilities. There are, however, some pillars that we feel hold up global citizenship as a moving and dynamic concept that enables the possibilities for equity. These pillars are what can make global citizenship accessible to everyone: deep listening to others, self-reflexivity, and engaged action within a global community.

Trying to address global citizenship is an ambitious task. In this paper we focus on three key themes through which we seek to speak to this delicate concept: interconnection and complexity, diversity and difference, and community and compassion.

“It is significant that we as global citizens learn to think critically and analyze situations instead of blindly accepting or agreeing. This is an important aspect of making change in society and it enables us to overcome prejudices and stereotypes.”

- Vera and Miriam, Sweden
I. Interconnection and Complexity

Our Ideals

- We want all people to be aware of the variety of connections between people and nations (historical, economic, political, social, cultural, etc.) and therefore aware of complexity of the world.
- We want a widespread understanding among people engaging in global citizenship that due to the complexity of the world, any and all knowledge we have is incomplete.
- People can and should challenge global citizenship (or refute it completely) but we can all agree that the world is complex and interconnected, due to past and present occurrences.
- Global citizenship actions should be done with all of the above in mind.
- Global citizens need to be aware that complexity and interconnectedness of the world has impacted our individual situation, and have an understanding of the specifics of their position.

The interconnectedness and interdependency of the world is what makes global citizenship complex, so an understanding of connections leads to a deeper understanding of global citizenship; one which asks people to question, constantly question and be critical of the idealistic simple solutions.

"The world is interconnected in a variety of ways, through technology, rapid access to information, political alliances, immigration, the need to fight for environmental causes and social equality, among others."

- Luiza, Brazil

"Understanding complexity and knowing how to deal with it is the first step to becoming a global citizen."

- Youssef, Morocco

"Many of the corporations that are involved in our everyday life operate in poorer communities by exploiting them in different ways in means of increasing profit. As a member of a richer nation where these corporations are based we are responsible to use our voices and consumership to try and decrease their exploitation, as well as using the democratic rights to change the laws of which enables the corporations to act the way they do."

- Vera and Miriam, Sweden
Our Concerns

Complexity means that expressions of global citizenship will differ according to how people are positioned in the world. Factors that influence and create the complexity include the diversity of people and cultures, existing inequalities (including within and through education systems), historical backgrounds, power structures between and within countries. These unequal relations of power result in inequities—systemic racism, neocolonialism, land dispossession, the gap between rich and poor, xenophobia, sexism, among others. For example, many people experience sexism due to the patriarchy, racism due to white supremacy, exploitation due to capitalism and so on.

What makes global citizenship complex is the need to understand how power is manifested. It is necessary to be aware of power structures (like so-called “developed” countries benefiting from historical colonization), root causes of the power structures that exist, connections between power structures and how power structures contribute to inequity. Therefore, we are concerned about a lack of awareness on the part of those in positions of privilege to address the deep power structures that tend to constrain the potential for a better life for others.

“Analyzing of the underlying assumptions and power dynamics that exist between larger and smaller powers must take place.”

- Katrina, Canada

“In Brazil, in the capitalist system in which we live, where everything revolves around money and power, one can have a clear vision of the power structure where people work to survive, pay their taxes and end up supporting a government that does not act on behalf of all citizens.”

- Luiza, Brazil
Our Questions

• How do we make a complex concept such as global citizenship accessible?
• Are we perpetuating global issues in our goal to prevent/undo them?
• How can we encourage people to promote change without falling into the trap of simplistic, feel-good approaches? How can we conceive of change (or “making a difference”) in a way that takes up rather than steps over complexity?
• Would introducing complexity and interdependencies at an earlier age and in an age-appropriate way open up possibilities/help to avoid getting invested in simple ideas?

Ways Forward

We know that creating policies is not easy because complexity and interconnectivity are things not only present but are “the DNA” of our respective societies. However, a critical spirit and a perpetual awareness of societal complexity coupled with a projection towards the future must be present in the educational programs in order to tackle global problems related to complexity.

Complexity and interconnection are features that will always characterize our world and raise challenges and concerns; therefore, building connections in education is mandatory in supporting global citizenship. Education can help present the complexity and interconnected nature of the world as a framework for global citizenship.

“Complexity was the main issue we found with global citizenship and education, and while we had potential answers, we were left with more questions! The initial question was how do we deal with the complexity of the issues in a way that will actually solve them, bearing in mind that generalising tends to water things down and paint over diversity in an unhealthy way.”

- Scarlett, New Zealand
II. Diversity and Difference

Our Ideals

- We want a situation in which people are comfortable expressing their world experience without having to suppress a part of themselves.
- Acknowledge that everyone has different needs and obligations, as individuals come with their own unique experiences and backgrounds.
- Give diverse voices in the global community an equitable hearing.
- Global citizenship must change as the world changes, and it must be defined by as many diverse people as possible, so it works for as many people as possible.

The Portuguese expression acolher illustrates the importance of accepting new ideas through openness. All countries and people have differing impacts on global issues, and it is important to be aware of everyone’s needs and obligations, which should also be looked at through a historical context. Equity should be put before equality because people want and need different things in life.

“Global citizenship aims to transcend borders, but does so in the social, cultural, political, and economic sense. It calls for unity, solidarity and a sense of a truly global community under the umbrella of the human species, but that does not mean it wants local identities to end.”

- Bob, Republic of the Philippines

“Even the most educated people do not know needs and wants of communities as well as the people who live there. The people who properly and fully understand their communities are the ones whose thoughts should be valued. This touches on the point that global citizenship should have conversations in which voices are equitably heard (as opposed to equally).”

- Scarlett, New Zealand
Our Concerns
Through diversity, we are all different but we still deserve the same basic rights. However, because of underlying power dynamics, some voices are accorded more importance. Our concern is that if all people are given the same volume of microphone, the volume of their voice (as a result of existing power structures) will change the conversation. Therefore, diversity should be about equity rather than equality. In order to reach equity in diversity, marginalized and diverse voices should be highlighted.

Often times, there is a lack of recognition of the multiple aspects and root causes of an issue. This lack of recognition is problematic as it does not enable us to take action in recognition of local contexts. Such actions are important because most often they do not take place on a global scale, but occur at a local level.

“We need to eliminate the perspective that you are only a Global Citizen once you are an adult. The best way to become a Global Citizen is learning at a young age.”

- Nasri, Kenya

“Global citizenship is not only about “international aids” as many people might think, we believe that behavioural, ethical and cooperative actions and deeds are the ones that are more effective and provides development on the long term!”

- Youssef, Morocco
Our Questions
• How can we encourage people to work towards greater understandings of difference, diversity and equity?
• How can difference and diversity be perceived as a strength as opposed to a deficiency?
• What can be done to foster respect with regards to the differences encountered?
• Why are some perspectives and worldviews more marginalised than others?

Ways Forward
Diverse perspectives should be incorporated in school curriculums around the world at a younger age. This would spread the concept of global citizenship as well as broaden views and enable more complex thinking, thus preventing future misunderstandings and fear of the unknown and allow an understanding of the nature of oppression. Students should be taught to understand the roots of their opinions as well as what informs their beliefs; schools could support this by participating in projects that broaden students’ knowledge and raise awareness about global issues. Furthermore, educators need to make sure that students have the chance to speak up and be taken seriously.

“Our problems aren’t our own. Our solutions can be shared, can be recycled...can be used by other countries. It’s the most beautiful thing.”

- Yolcia, Republic of the Philippines
III. Community, Relationality and Compassion

Our Ideals

- We are all connected; it is through shifting the focus from individual to community development that we can achieve change and form a sustainable community.
- A critical and respectful understanding of community, relationality and compassion allows for more ethical relations.
- Two essential factors of global citizenship are compassion which enables us to see beyond the walls of our own perception and relationality which helps us recognize ourselves within the global community.

We must challenge the perception that global issues are the responsibility of other people or nations.

Learning to consider the effects of the choices we make on a local and global scale as well as carefully choosing what we support is important. Global citizens should develop a mindset built on unity and solidarity and realize that working towards improving global issues is an investment for everyone. As global citizens, it is essential for us to not only realize what we are doing wrong as a community but how to correct our mistakes and learn from others.

The survey data (see Appendix) acquired through this project shows that respondents tend not to view issues as very potent when on a local level; however, on a global level, they are usually viewed as a larger issue.

“The ideal of the good life is built through the search of the wellness of others. If life is like a rainblos, there must be rain and sun to see her different colors.”

- Salaeta, Haiti

“One important point that needs to be changed is moving from considering our status away from other countries and starting to look upon our situation as an important part of the global context. Each country should start considering other countries’ situations while looking upon theirs.”

- the students from Palestine
Our Concerns

We are concerned that global citizenship tends to be used in a way that develops a kind of saviour perspective. A saviour complex results in the creation of further divisions because people are portrayed as objects of pity instead of equal in dignity and rights. Therefore, compassion is called for which encourages learning from and trying to figure out ways to support each other.

Through the international survey, we noticed that many people see problems as beyond their own communities. For instance, issues such as poverty, environmental issues, racism, and freedom of religion are more likely to be noted as “global issues” rather than problems within local communities. This makes us distance ourselves from these issues and consider it as not our responsibility to solve them.

A shift in focus is required to understand the struggle between operating as an individual as opposed to acting as a member of a community. Individualism allows a slide back into forgetting our connections with others, potentially leading to a perpetuation of already existing inequities. Injustice and the imbalance of power leads to marginalization.
Our Questions
What are the barriers to learning from one another?
How do existing power structures affect us?

• Am I able to assume responsibilities towards the others? How are others impacted by my actions?
• To what extent can we expect the marginalized to feel compassionate towards people who contribute to their oppression?
• Is anyone shut out of the conversation? Who are we speaking over right now? Are we listening to the right people?
• How do we create a community in which we are working towards equity?

It is integral to the conversation of global citizenship that we consider these questions constantly if we want to make a change that is long-lasting. In that sense, we must become aware of how our actions are impacting the whole.

Ways Forward
More international collaborations between students from different parts of the world promotes compassion and relationality and supports local, national and global communities. Curricula should broaden perspectives and teach about relationality, power relations, colonial history and oppression in order to fully understand what structures our relations. Facilitators of global citizenship need to be aware (as all global citizens do) of economic, social, and political power structures and how these affect people’s capacity to be involved.
IV. Recommendations

By providing a variety of perspectives on the world, global citizenship education can be presented in a way that promotes equity. It should also be framed as something that is growing and changing. This will allow students to challenge and change the concept. We therefore make the following recommendations.

Curricula
Curricula must teach a global perspective in relation to principles of equity, complexity, interconnection, diversity, and community by:
• Addressing complexity and root causes of global issues to open up possibilities rather than promoting simplistic, feel-good citizenship responses.
• Exploring how different perspectives and worldviews originate, including what informs the opinions and beliefs of students themselves.
• Making transparent global power relations, colonial history and oppression in order to fully understand what structures our relations.

All concepts should be introduced at an earlier age and be adapted in age-appropriate ways for students at all levels.

We ask for flexible curricula that provide these same basic concepts but offers different branches depending on situation, hierarchical scales and community needs. As an example, education should introduce a variety of perspectives on global citizenship, including critiques and edits of the concept.
Critical Thinking
Critical thinking is, without a doubt, a catalyst for mind mechanisms based on the fact that it enables youth to continually support and amplify their comprehension of the world. It is essential that education:
• Helps students seek out, listen to and incorporate marginalized perspectives in order to question and possibly unlearn mainstream ways of thinking and address inequitable balance between the dominant and marginalized perspectives.
• Gives space to students to express their ideas and skills, encouraging them to learn from their mistakes and experiment with new iterations, rather than focusing on standard academic assessment.

School Structures
School structures could be set up to promote education as a community enterprise rather than a single lane race, where the focus is on individual learning and achievement.
• Setting up non–traditional classroom structures and collaborations (i.e. not single grade or single subject classrooms) to make students aware of the interconnections between school subjects and between students, as they learn from each other.
• Creating collaborative spaces to foster exchange across differences, such as online collaborations across national borders.
• Providing teachers with professional development for the challenging work of global citizenship as expressed in this paper.
• Remove barriers to learning from and with one another (i.e. reduce competition as a motivator for student learning).
V. Conclusion

It is critical that these recommendations be taken seriously. Unless we consider the complexity of global issues, take seriously our differences, and recognize how we are connected in a global community, we may inadvertently reduce access to human rights and contribute to inequities. If we truly want to see a just world, we have to start thinking about global citizenship critically. The term global citizenship is itself such an opportunity to unite around one single cause despite the diversity standing between people and nations! Consequently, the right approach is perhaps not to pursue the real definition of global citizenship but to never stop looking for it! And we, as youth, want to contribute our voices because we have a perspective that our world is lacking. It is also wrongly assumed that young people are no more than leaders of “tomorrow”. It is our right but also our duty to be leaders of today. As we navigate through our thoughts, perspectives and actions we restore something that is often missed: hope!

“Adults aren’t the only actors of global citizenship.”

What would you add/change to these statements?
How does this cyclical/seasonal metaphor helpful to understanding global citizenship?

1. What other metaphors would you use to describe global citizenship?
   Capture your metaphor in a picture, poem, story, or other creative form.

2. Revisit your metaphor at the end of the unit. Would you still choose the same metaphor?

I. Interconnection and Complexity

Our Ideals
- We want all people to be aware of the variety of connections between people and nations (historical, economic, etc.).
- We want a world that is more connected.
- People can agree that the world is shrinking.
- Global citizenship is a necessity.
- Global citizenship is important in our world position.

The interconnected world is complex, so a global citizen needs to understand citizenship; one that is not idealistic simplicity.

ACTIVITY

Choose a global issue or current event in the news and consider the following:

How are local, national and global governance structures and systems interconnected and interdependent (trade, migration, environment, media, international organizations, political and economic alliances, public and private sectors, civil society)

Critically reflect on what it means to be a member of a global community and how to respond to common problems and issues

Reflect on in/qualities between nation states and their implications for exercising rights and obligations

Consider the interconnected nature of global issues (root causes, factors, agents, dimensions, intl organizations, multinational corporations)

- Luiza, Brazil
- Youssef, Morocco

Everyday people in every country need to remember that we are all connected and need to support democratic principles and the protection of human rights and freedom.
"Complex challenges in an interconnected world" introduces the idea of "global megatrends," which cut across "social, technological, economic, political and even environmental dimensions."

While you are reading, discuss the following:

Consider the interconnected nature of global issues (root causes, factors, agents, dimensions, int'l organizations, multinational corporations).

Reflect on in/equalities between nation states and their implications for exercising rights and obligations.

How are local, national and global governance structures and systems interconnected and interdependent (trade, migration, environment, media, int'l organizations, political and economic alliances, public and private sectors, civil society)?
"Are you a 'global citizen'?
Really? What does that mean?"
- Michael Byers

While you read, discuss the following:

What are some difficulties with the terms "global citizen" and "global citizenship"?

Who is a global citizen? Who decides?
Our Questions
- How do we make a complex concept such as global citizenship accessible?
- Are we perpetuating global issues in our goal to prevent/undo them?
- How can we encourage people to promote change without falling into the trap of simplistic feel-good approaches that take up a significant amount of time?
- Would introducing more change or shifting the focus away from changing the world make us more likely to feel like we're accomplishing something?

Ways Forward
We know that we need to be present in the world in order to be able to create a better one. The question is not only present but also perpetually absent. Even in the future, many of the challenges and complexities that we face today will remain. We need to support globally engaged students in understanding the nature of the world around us and in helping them to use their power wisely.

ACTIVITY

1. Consider the following global citizenship actions:

- Voting in an election
- Using social media (Facebook, Twitter, Instagram, Snapchat, etc.)
- Walking or taking public transportation
- Knowing how to cook
- Being able to sew
- Growing your own food
- Watching local, national, global news
- Speaking more than one language
- Participating in a public protest
- Visiting another country
- Studying global development in school
- Getting your family to recycle or compost more
- Sponsoring a child in another country
- Subscribing to a news feed or blog focusing on global events
- Discussing global events with your family
- Donating to an international relief agency
- Creating a social justice/peace/environmental club in school
- Joining a political party
- Seeking out perspectives of people who are marginalized
- Researching how your clothing was made
- Submitting poetry to the local/school newspaper that challenges consumer habits
- Being kind to every single person you encounter
- Buying only fair trade products
- Buying local food at the market instead of the grocery store
- Writing a letter to a politician
- Volunteering in a community agency
- Studying the historical/political context of a global issue
- Attending a conference, film or lecture about global issues
- Engaging in a non-violent demonstration
- Engaging in a violent demonstration
- Finding a quiet space in wilderness to listen to nature
- Engaging in the Student Union at school
- Positioning yourself against any kind of corruption and denouncing it
- Engaging in local, national and global conferences
- Engaging with your local community
- Engaging with a religious organization such as church, mosque, temple, etc.
- Engaging in other social movements (hip hop; adult education; environment; human rights; animal protection; theater intervention; performances; feminist group; indigenous group; racialized group; LGBTQ group).

ACTIVITY

2. Complete the following table

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Less effective</th>
<th>More effective</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Positive</td>
<td>Negative</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Negative</td>
<td>Positive</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Place the actions on an axis contrasting positive/negative impacts and more/less effective actions for creating a more just world.

In pairs, discuss why you arranged these actions as you did. Consider how various actions may challenge injustice and inequities, and how they may demonstrate ethical and social responsibility.
Our Questions
- How do we make a complex concept such as global citizenship accessible?
- Are we perpetuating global issues in our goal to prevent/undo them?
- How can we encourage people to promote change without falling into the trap of simplistic feel-good approaches that take up way open up?

Ways Forward
We know that to be prepared for the future, not only present challenges and difficulties but also provide opportunities. It is essential to recognize that complexity and diversity of global citizenship, as well as the challenges and opportunities it presents, will always be present in our world. The ability to foster an understanding of global citizenship is crucial for the development of a more interconnected and collaborative world.

ACTIVITY

3. Discuss or write a response to the following questions:

How does this activity contribute to our understanding of global citizenship?

On what basis did you determine “effectiveness”? Which actions did you find the most effective? Are these the same activities that you would likely get involved with? Where do you fit along the continuum? Explain.

Which actions raised the most discussion and debate in your group? Why do you think they were contentious?
Our Questions

- How do we make a complex concept such as global citizenship accessible?
- Are we perpetuating global issues in our goal to prevent/undo them?
- How can we encourage people to promote change without falling into the trap of simplistic feel-good approaches that take up space?
- Would introducing a critical way open up complexity?

Ways Forward

We know that the problems are not only present but also eternal, so it is vital to challenge the ideas that perpetuate problems. This complexity can, however, present a challenge as we need to support global justice yet maintain the nature of the problem.

While you read, discuss:

Popular humanitarian projects are critiqued for making students feel good about doing good rather than asking them to do the hard work of facing complexity and their complicity in inequities.

Think of an example of a global citizenship or humanitarian project that is run through your school and/or community.

Does this article make you see this project any differently? How?

How can we demonstrate ethical and social responsibility without falling into the issues presented in the article?

How do we challenge injustice and inequities without simplifying issues?
II. Diversity and Difference

Our Ideals
- We want a situation in which people are comfortable expressing their world experience without having to sacrifice their own unique experiences.
- Acknowledge our own unique experiences.
- Give diverse people a voice.
- Global citizens want to promote the well-being of diverse people.

The Portuguese word “pluralism” means openness. All we need is for everyone to be aware of everyone else, and recognize the historical contributions of different groups of people to things in life.

“Global citizenship” is the recognition of the social, cultural, and economic diversity of the world, recognizing that one wants local, national, and global citizenship.

ACTIVITY

What constitutes a good life?

1. Write a piece describing “what constitutes a good life.” Speak to three people in your family and local community and incorporate their understandings in your written work.

2. As you watch the videos, keep the following questions in mind:

- What different notions of the good life are evident? Of justice?
- What challenges and opportunities exist for living in diverse societies and cultures?
- How can we engage in actions for social justice at different levels: local, national, global? How can global citizenship support “living well on the planet”?

Our Concerns

Through diversity, we are all different but we still deserve the same basic rights. However, because of underlying power dynamics, some voices are accorded more importance. Our concern is that if all people are given the same volume of microphone, the volume of their voice (as a result of the amount they speak) should be able to overpower the volume of power and diverse voices that speak in their behalf.

Often times, the voices of the rich and powerful are heard first, and at times, the voices of the poor and marginalized are not heard at all. This lack of representation affects people at the local level, not only in one country but at the global scale. Global citizenship is important and requires that we all have a voice.

“Global citizenship is a different idea that people must explore, as we live as a cooperative planet.”

- Nasri Kenya

ACTIVE

Underlying assumptions and power dynamics

Consider these questions as you watch the videos:

Whose perspectives are included/excluded/marginalized, and who decides?

How do the following factors facilitate or hinder citizenship and civic engagement at global, national and local levels:

- social, economic inequities
- political dynamics
- power relations
- marginalization, discrimination
- state, military/police power
- social movements, trade unions?

How does this help you understand in/equity, in/equality, discrimination, marginalization?
Soft Versus Critical Global Citizenship Education

Based on what you imagine to be a “mainstream” perspective of global citizenship (where “mainstream” refers to what most people around you think), what do you think is missing from a mainstream understanding of global citizenship?

Based this article, what do you need to change or unlearn about your understanding of global citizenship, or your responsibilities towards other people around the world. Explain.

Moving forward, what are 3-5 questions global citizens should ask before they proceed to act?
Our Questions
- How can we encourage people to work towards greater understandings of difference, diversity and equity?
- How can difference and diversity be perceived as a strength as opposed to a deficiency?
- What can be done to support this?
- Why are some people more inclined to speak up about global injustices?

Ways Forward
Diverse perspectives can help younger age groups to understand the unknown and support this by engaging in conversations about global injustices.

“Our problem is not that we need to be recycled, our problem is that we need to be beautiful!”
III. Community, Relationality and Compassion

Our Ideals

- We are all connected. It is through shifting the focus from individual to community development.
- A critical and peaceful shift for more equal and just societies.
- Two essential parts of the walls of the global community.
- We must change ourselves or nations.

Learning to collectively see and carefully choose our investments in life and investment for the future.

The survey data and this activity serve as a reminder of the role we can play in global issues. Each person has an impact on theirs.”
- Salaeta, Haiti

ACTIVITY

Journaling

Students begin by journaling your activities for a day (everything from brushing teeth to creeping Facebook). Then, with a partner/class, connect daily activities to global world (i.e. where were clothes made, where were bananas imported from, did you game online with people elsewhere, did you see particular politics in the news, did you dispose of items unnecessarily, etc.).

Discuss:

What motivates people to understand what is happening in other places in the world? Why might people not understand what happens in the world?

As students, what is the extent of our role in global issues?

In what ways are we responsible to take action? In what ways are we constrained? Are we part of the global system without choice?
III. Community, Relationality and Compassion

Our Ideals
- We are all connected. It is through shifting the focus from individual to community development.
- A critical aspect is for more effective connectivity.
- Two essential elements are the walls of the global community and the global commons.
- We must change institutions or nations.

Learning to connect, carefully choosing where and how to invest time and energy, can lead to looking at the environment in a new light and taking actions to do good.

The survey data indicates a desire to view issues from an international perspective and be viewed as a larger global community.

MIDWAY a Message from the Gyre

Discuss:

Whose responsibility is the collection of garbage in Midway, which is contributing to the deaths of the albatross?

How can we engage in actions for environmental justice at different levels: local, national, global?
Our Concerns
We are concerned that global citizenship tends to be used in a way that develops a kind of saviour perspective. A saviour complex results in the creation of further divisions because people are portrayed as objects of pity instead of equal in dignity and rights. Therefore, compassion is replaced by support.

Through the journeys of our own communities, we must remember our freedom of responsibility. Our local communities demand that we take ownership of our responsibility and our connection.

A shift in focus from global to local is required.

Education for Self Reliance

Summarize Nyerere’s recommendations for education and discuss their relevance to your local context.
IV. Recommendations

By providing a variety of perspectives on the world, global citizenship education can be presented in a way that promotes equity. It should also be framed as something that is growing and changing.

Curricula

Curricula must be flexible and interconnecting:

• Addressing global challenges while promoting sensitivity and understanding.
• Exploring how different cultures can respect and understand each other's differences.
• Making transnational connections

All concepts should reach all students at all levels.

We ask for flexibility in the development of branches depending on the needs of the education sought, and the biggest improvements and edits of the research.
V. Conclusion

It is critical that these recommendations be taken seriously. Unless we consider the complexity of global issues, take seriously our differences, and recognize how we are connected in a global community, we will not truly want to pursue the long-term global changes that diversity stands for. To pursue the role of youth, want to be right but also wrong, and actions with your classmates, your school, your communities affecting global issues?
